

Buying Commercial Property in Omaha Real Estate Law Firm Guide If you have found the right building off 120th Street or a pad site along West Dodge Road, the excitement of the deal can make the legal steps Law Firm feel like paperwork to rush through. They are not. Commercial real estate purchases lock in obligations that last for years, and the time to catch a problem is before closing, not after the keys change hands. Erickson | Sederstrom P.C., L.L.O. represents developers, builders, investors, lenders, owners, landlords, and tenants in commercial real estate matters. Its small law firm real estate practice covers conveyances, development, licensure, construction, property tax, and 1031 exchanges. For a buyer, that breadth matters because a single acquisition can touch several of those issues at once. A warehouse near Eppley Airfield, a retail center in La Vista, and a small office building in Rockbrook each come with their own zoning, title, and tax questions, and none of them should be treated like a routine residential closing. Most purchases follow a similar sequence. The buyer and seller negotiate a purchase agreement that sets the price, contingencies, and timeline. Due diligence follows, which often includes title review, surveys, environmental review, zoning confirmation, and a close look at existing leases if the property has tenants. Financing terms from the lender need to line up with the purchase agreement. Then the conveyance documents are prepared and the deal closes. Each stage offers a chance to negotiate protections, and a real estate law firm in Omaha can help a buyer decide which risks to accept and which to push back on.

Tax planning often shapes the deal from the start. Investors selling one property to buy another may want to structure the transaction as a 1031 deferred exchange, which the firm handles through both its real estate and tax practices. Buyers planning renovation or new construction may want the firm's construction law attorneys involved early, since complex commercial project disputes are far easier to prevent than to litigate. Property tax questions in Douglas County and Sarpy County can affect long-term carrying costs as well, and the real estate team advises on those issues too. If the purchase is part of a larger business deal, corporate attorneys can coordinate the entity that takes title.
