By late October, the trees around Roath Park Lake have usually dropped most of their leaves, and a fair share of them end up in somebody's guttering. The Cardiff roofers same thing happens along the avenues by Bute Park, around Cathays Park and the civic centre, and on every street lined with mature trees. Redland Roofing Cardiff, a family-owned roofing contractor based in Rumney, sees the results every autumn: overflowing gutters, blocked downpipes and damp patches that weren't there in the summer. Blocked guttering is easy to shrug off, but it causes more damage than most people expect. When leaves pack into a gutter, rainwater has nowhere to go, so it spills over the edge and runs down the wall. Over time that soaks brickwork, stains render and rots fascias and soffits. Water can also back up under the bottom row of slates or tiles. Downpipes clogged with leaf mulch send water pouring out of the joints, often right above a back door. With Cardiff getting well over a metre of rain a year, a gutter that stops working in November can do a lot of harm by March. Terraced streets in Roath, Cathays and Plasnewydd have an extra weak spot in the valley gutter, the lead-lined channel between two roof slopes or behind a parapet. Leaves collect there and are hard to see from the ground. On taller Victorian houses around Albany Road and Wellfield Road, reaching them safely needs the right access, not a wobbly ladder on a pavement. John and his team clear gutters, valleys and downpipes, check the lead for splits, and replace sections of guttering that have cracked or sagged. New gutters are one of the recurring themes in the firm's Google reviews, often fitted alongside fresh fascias and soffits.
