Shared Fault Rules for 18 Wheeler Crashes in Texas Texas uses a modified comparative fault system, which the law calls proportionate responsibility. If you're found partly at fault for a crash, your recovery is reduced by your share of the blame. If you're found more than 50 percent responsible, you can't recover damages at all. Trucking insurers know this rule well, and they often try to push as much blame as possible onto the other driver. They might say you were speeding, changed lanes without signaling or sat in the truck's blind spot. Every percentage point they can shift onto you reduces what they have to pay. Texas Truck Accident Lawyer pushes back with evidence. Truck data, camera footage, witness interviews and crash reconstruction can show what really happened. The goal is a clear, fair account of fault, not one written by the trucking company's defense team. Fault can also be shared among several defendants, not just between you and the truck driver. A Texas jury may assign percentages to the driver, the carrier, a maintenance company and others. Under Texas rules, a defendant found more than 50 percent responsible can generally be required to pay the full amount of the damages, while others pay only their own share. Understanding how those rules work helps the firm decide which parties to bring into the case and how to present the evidence of each one's responsibility for the crash.

Responsibility can extend beyond the driver to the motor carrier, the trailer owner, the shipper or loader, the maintenance provider and sometimes a parts manufacturer or freight broker. Container trucks around the Port of Houston often involve several of these parties at once. The firm investigates each one so every source of insurance coverage is found. What should I do right after an 18 wheeler accident? Call 911, get medical care and, if you can, photograph the truck, its USDOT number, the trailer and the scene. Get witness names and numbers, and don't give a recorded statement to the trucking company's insurer. Key evidence includes the truck's engine control module data, electronic logging device records, dash and cab camera footage, the driver qualification file and maintenance records.
