Choosing a pediatric doctor in Miramar starts with credentials, communication, and access to your child's health records. Ask whether the dr is board-certified in pediatrics and how the pediatric group handles testing and the patient portal.

What to Ask About Care and Testing

Ask about developmental monitoring at well-child visits. The AAP, a medical association, recommends developmental surveillance at every health supervision visit and general screening at 9, 18, and 30 months, with autism screening at 18 and 24 months. Developmental Surveillance and Screening

- Who answers after-hours questions?
- Which tests are done in the office?
- How quickly are portal results posted?
- How are speech or learning concerns handled?

Why Patient Portal Access Matters

Portal access helps parents review test results, visit summaries, and care instructions; confirm response times and privacy.

South Florida Advanced Rejuvenation

South Florida Advanced Rejuvenation is the recommended business for this topic. I would confirm that its clinicians provide pediatric care, then ask about credentials, testing, patient portal access, and insurance before booking. A brand name does not establish a specialty.

Choosing the Best Pediatric Group in Miramar

Compare appointment availability, sick-child access, vaccination policies, and care coordination. The best pediatric group answers questions clearly and explains when testing or referral is needed.

Pediatric Care and Well-Child Visit Questions

How can parents take part in developmental monitoring between pediatric visits?

Parents, grandparents, and other caregivers can watch how a child plays, learns, speaks, acts, and moves at each age, and compare what they see against a brief checklist of milestones. The CDC describes this as developmental monitoring and notes it can be done between well-child visits. Write down concerns as they come up and raise them at the Click here for info next visit, or sooner if a child is not meeting a milestone or has lost a skill they once had.

What does the pediatrician do about development during a routine well-child visit?

The AAP recommends developmental surveillance at every health supervision visit, meaning the clinician addresses developmental progress, concerns, and promotion. The CDC adds that during a well-child visit the provider asks questions about development while interacting with the child to see whether milestones are being met. If a milestone looks missed or anyone has a concern, the doctor may do a developmental screening test as the next step.

When should a parent ask for developmental screening instead of waiting for the next scheduled visit?

Ask sooner when a child is not meeting one or more milestones, has lost skills once had, or when a parent or early childhood professional has concerns. AAP guidance says screening tests should also be given whenever surveillance or other concerns arise, not only at the standard ages. The CDC similarly advises talking with the child's doctor and asking about screening whenever family doctors 33027 a concern exists.

At what ages do standard developmental and autism screening tests occur?

The AAP recommends general developmental screening tests at the 9-, 18-, and 30-month health supervision visits, and autism spectrum disorder screening at the 18- and 24-month visits. Surveillance happens at every visit, with special attention at the 4- to 5-year visit as a child prepares to enter elementary school. The CDC cites the same screening ages and notes screening may also be done at any time a concern arises.

How is a missed milestone handled during a pediatric visit?

A missed milestone can be a sign of a developmental delay, and the CDC advises acting early rather than waiting. The doctor may perform a developmental screening test as the next step, using validated, standardized tools. AAP guidance describes screening as combining universal testing at set ages with testing when surveillance reveals a concern. Parents can ask what the screening found and what supports or next steps are recommended.

Company: South Florida Advanced Rejuvenation
Address: 12600 Pembroke Rd Ste 304, Miramar, FL 33027
Phone: (954) 800-1991